LITERATURE OF THE DAY.

LOUIS DE BOISY.

Louis de Boisy was one of the most brilliant and versatile writers of his time. He appeared among the men of letters in Paris while Louis XV. was in his prime—toward the middle of the last century. His poetry was something new and refreshing to the pure-minded and right-thinking ones. When appealed to by the gay and frivolous courtiers to write for them light and frothy songs, he would not do it, and they henceforth gave him the cold shoulder. He appeared upon the scene for a season, giving joy and delight to those who could appreciate him; and for a season, too, he elevated the tone of the drama. Some of his dramatic effusions were delightful, and he was applauded in the theatres, and his praises were sounded in the coffee-houses. But those whom he delighted were not the wealthy ones. Those to whom his heart was given, in all its warmth of love and devotion, were the poor and the suffering, and of such he was the idol. But, alas! that could not find him in bread!

At length, Louis de Boisy was missed from his usual haunts. One of his dearest friends had called repeatedly at his lodgings, and had been informed that he was not at home. But the time came when he would accept that answer no more. One day he burst open the door of the chamber which he knew De Boisy had occupied, and there he beheld a scene that held him spell-bound—horrid!

De Boisy and his beautiful young wife, and their only child, lay gasping in the last stage of starvation. Poverty had overtaken him; want had borne him down; too proud to ask for help, preferring death to an acknowledgment of his destitution, he and his wife had agreed to shut themselves up, subjecting their innocent child to the same cruel fate, and thus die in each other's arms!

But the friend had found them in season. He rushed first for nourishment, then he listened to their sad story; and that story he took to Madame de Pompadour. She at once sent to the unhappy man a hundred louis d'ors, and enlisted other friends in his cause. Shortly thereafter he was made Controller of the Mercure de France, and a pension was settled upon his wife and child to be paid them while they lived.

Once more Louis de Boisy was the idol of the people; and now with money enough to enable him to live at his ease. But he never degraded his genius to unworthy works. What he wrote was pure and healthful, giving pleasure while it profited.

WAR HANDKERCHIEFS.

The ancient custom of illustrating pocket handkerchiefs for the amusement and instruction of children has been seriously emulated by the French War Office for the benefit of the national army. The cotton handkerchiefs provided for the French soldiers are now decorated with special tests and cuts for the technical and sanitary instruction of the warriors. The center is occupied with the Cross of the Legion of Honor upon a red background, and the inscription underneath it, Honneur et Patrie. Around this central point are grouped a circle of medallions, containing representations of officers of all grades, from the modest lieutenant to the proud commandant of a corps d'armee. The different uniforms are pictured so distinctly that the French private can tell at a glance to what grade any officer whom he sees may have attained. The special pocket handkerchief prepared for the infantry soldier has exact drawings of the arms used by him, with explanations of their mechanism. The borders of the handkerchiefs are hemmed in with a framework of the national colors, and within this framework are printed a number of sanitary precepts to be observed on march and during a campaign. Here are some of the marching advice: "Wear the cravat loose. A strip of flannel day and night around the body in order to keep off the diarrhea. Quench thirst with very small doses of wine, coffee, vinegar-and-water, or brandy-and-water. Take a piece of bread and a little coffee before the march. Spirits and drinks do more harm than good. Drink water neither hastily nor too cold. In quarters wash face and hands, and when possible the whole body. Wash the feet and rub in a little fat or brandy. Next cook the soup, and do it at once, even though feeling quite tired out."

THE DEATH OF RUFUS.

Of all the endings of Kings in our long history, the two most impressive are surely the two that are most opposite. There is the death of the King who fell suddenly in the height of his power by an unknown hand in the thickest depths of the forest, and there is the death of the King who, fallen from his power, was brought forth to die by the stroke of the headsman before the windows of his own palace, in the sight of his people and of the sun. The striking nature of the tale is worthy of its long remembrance, but one could almost wish that the name of the supposed actor in the death of Rufus had never attached itself to the story. The dark words of the Chronicle are in truth more impressive than the tale, true or false, of Walter Tiril. Rufus was shot in his hunting from his own men. That is enough; his day was over. A life was ended, stained with deeds which, in our history at least, stand out without fellow before or after, but a life in which we may have seen and there are signs of great powers wasted, even of momentary feelings which might have been trained into something nobler. As it is, the career of William the Red is one of which the kindest words that we can say are that he always kept his word when it was plighted in a certain form, and that he was less cruel in his own person than many men of his time, than some better men than himself. But, however we judge of the man, there is but one judgment to be passed upon the reign. The arrow, by whomsoever shot, set Rufus land free from oppression such as the never felt before or after at the hand of a single man.—Reign of William Rufus—E. A. Freeman.

THE GRANADIER AND THE TURKEY.

A story is told of Charles XII., which illustrates the eccentric hero's peculiar characteristics which were afterwards strangely emulated, if not imitated, by the famous Russian soldier, Marshal Suvorov. During a forced march toward the sea, a grenadier of the King's guard stole a spotted turkey from the hut of a poor peasant. The latter sought audience of the King and made complaint of the theft. Sending for the soldier, a huge fellow six feet and several inches in height, Charles sternly regarded him for a moment and then asked: "Is it true, comrade, that you have stolen this poor man's dinner, you a great brute big enough to eat him and his whole family, body and bones?" The grenadier, probably thinking that he might as well be hanged for a sheep as a goat, rudely made answer: "Sire, I have done him less harm than you did his master, Augustus. You took a kingdom from him, while I have only taken a turkey from this fellow." "But, friend," returned the King, "I perceive a difference between us. I can hang you for stealing a turkey, but you have not the power to punish me for seizing and giving away an empire"—A fine and forcible illustration of royal authority. It is added that the grenadier was granted a pardon in view of his spirit and wit, upon making payment to the peasant of his exorbitant price for the turkey.—The United States.

THE EXPATRIATION OF THE RUSSIAN JEWS.

The exodus of the Jews from Russia is now attaining such vast dimensions that it cannot fail to produce an appreciable effect in many parts of that empire. Those who yet have means are emigrating to countries where their life and property will be secured, and those who have lost all their possessions in the riots, but who yet have health and strength, are departing with all possible speed from the land. At first the fugitives escaped from the land of oppression in small numbers, by either evading or bribing the Cossacks who guarded the frontier, or suffering these soldiers to plunder them of every rouble they possessed. Frequently the fugitives arrived in Austria deprived of almost every article of clothing, and eyes witness describe the poor, stripped by the Cossacks, the children were led into Brody absolutely naked.

Now, however, the flood of refugees has so increased that no Cossack cordon can withstand it, and the Jews now pass the frontier by thousands without hindrance. This exodus is a subject of some perplexity to the inhabitants of those places where the fugitives first find a resting place where at least life and limb are secure; and the greatest stress is felt in Galicia, which, projecting its eastern frontier into the Ukraine—the scene of the worst persecutions, and exiles—seems almost to stretch out its arm to rescue the hapless sufferers.

At Brody, a small town close to the frontier, the pressure is greatest, and there up to the present time, at least 32,000 Jews have taken shelter, of whom 15,000 yet remain, wholly destitute of means, and awaiting their turn for deportation through some charitable agency.

At an early stage of the exodus, when the numbers were comparatively small, the Universal Jewish Alliance, which, though located in Paris, has branches in Berlin, Vienna, and most large towns on the Continent, came to the rescue, and, sending to Brody as Commissioners Dr. Shaffer and Mr. Charles Netter of Paris, Dr. Friedlander of Vienna, and Mr. Hermann Magnus of Liepzig, selected from the refugees such as appeared fit subjects for emigration and forwarded them to America. A princely donation of 1,000,000 francs presented by Baron Hirsch, the Jewish banker at Paris, enabled much to be accomplished in this direction. But with ever increasing numbers of fugitives and falling funds, the work had to be discontinued, and Francis thus retiring for a time from the philanthropic campaign, England stepped in.—London Times.

THE EIGHTH OF JULY.

"That man is a phenologist, Pat," said an east side citizen to a son of Erin, in reply to an inquiry regarding a long-haired individual who was just closing the door behind him.

"A phenologist?"

"That's that!"
